GOULD LOST WESTERN PACIFIC ON A LOAN

ROAD SAID TO HAVE RIGHTS TO USE SOUTHERN PACIFIC TRACKS.

As the year closes the Western Pacific becomes a deeper and deeper mystery in the railroad world, says the Salt Lake Tribune. According to information furnished by a high railroad official in Salt Lake, in position to know all the facts, the Southern Pacific and the Western Pacific have practically completed arrangements whereby the Western Pacific shall have the use on the most possible friendly terms, of all of the Southern Pacific tracks, side tracks, terminals and wharves in middle and northern California. Following out its policy of silence toward the press, the local headquarters of the Western Pacific profess to know nothing of one of the most significant railroad deals that has been known in Salt Lake railroad circles for months.

but the matter has been a common topic of conversation in the other offices for some days.

"The idea is this," said one prominent local railroad man last week, "the Western Pacific is to have the use of all the Southern Pacific trackage in California, so as to save building new tracks for the new road. But it also means that the northern line of the Southern Pacific and the Western Pacific are very liable to be operated as a double track system, the trains going west on one line and running east on another. What this means in handling traffic need not be explained, it is so plain.

"The deal was made between Harriman and Gould some time ago, and is just now coming to light because the Western Pacific is just beginning to do business. When the Wheeling and Lake Erie short time notes came due Gould could not raise the money to meet them. He had to have $7,000,000 at once and could not get it. He was turned down by every banking house capable of helping him in New York city, and at last he went to see Harriman. The Wheeling and Lake Erie is now in a receiver's hands, by the way, and Gould has lost the Western Maryland.

"Harriman let Gould have the $7,000,000, which saved him from bankruptcy, but asked, 'How about the Western Pacific?' That was his price, and the results are just coming to light. Harriman had a long head.

"It is understood that Gould is practically eliminated from the Western Pacific and has been for some time; that Hill has the final say as to the operating end of the road and that of the traffic department. The recent underwriting of $175,000,000 of Missouri Pacific bonds, and the Missouri Pacific is the backbone of the Gould lines, by Kuhn, Loeb & Co., the Harriman bankers, certainly bears this out."

The above information was confirmed in three railroad offices last week independently of each other, but no information could be gained about it from the Salt Lake offices of the Western Pacific.
